The Narwhal is a kind of medium whale. Its body is as big as a large dolphin. The total body size is about from 13 to 18 feet. The male Narwhal has a long, big, and straight tooth outside his mouth. The female sometimes grows a small tooth of her own, but it doesn't become a big one outside her mouth as the male.

Narwhals live in the Arctic Waters around Greenland, Canada, and Russia all the year. They won't swim to the south because the weather there is too hot for them. They can live up to 50 years. However, they often die because people there catch them as food or kill them just for selling their teeth. What's more, the fact that they can't get air under the thick ice may also make them die. They feed on the small fishes; however, young Narwhals may die because there is not enough food for them in the cold water.

Most of the time, we can see Narwhals swim in groups of 15 to 20. In winter, because of the large pieces of ice, the size of the group would become smaller. Like other whales, Narwhals can talk with each other by knocking. They also blow in the sea, but not as high or clearly as other large whales do.
